In this lecture I argue for the value of a self-regulatory approach to law and criminal justice. I do so by first describing and critiquing the dominant approachto regulation in use today: deterrence. I suggest that in practice this model is costly and minimally effective in securing compliance with the law and motivating the acceptance of decisions made by police officers and judges.

Introduction. Legitimacy is the essential but ambiguous foundation of the criminal justice system: essential because the system cannot function without legitimacy and ambiguous because there is no consensus on what it means, precisely. It is a concept that applies not just to the criminal justice system and its processes, but also to political institutions and processes generally—primarily public institutions, but private ones too.
